Question

Subject: Promotional product supplier margins

Question ID: 136800

There is a large industry in the US that decorates various articles (hats, pens, watches, shirts, etc.) with logos and messages for business customers.

These products are usually offered through distributors, who do not manufacture the products. My question is not about the distributors but about the businesses that supply them. Regarding these suppliers, what sources are there to learn about their margins? How much margin do these suppliers make when selling to/through distributors? How much of that margin is a mark up on the article itself? How much is a charge for applying the logo and/or message to the article? Does the margin vary much based either on the type of article or by the means used to apply the decoration (silk screen, embroidery, etc.?)

Answer

Subject: Re: Promotional product supplier marginsAnswered By: prof-ga on 07 Jan 2003 10:14 PST

Brandbuilder,

Thanks for the question. Actually, this is a much more complicated question than you might first suspect. I've been involved as a provider of websites to promotional products distributor as well as suppliers for several years, and the pricing structure is really rather complicated.

As you may know, suppliers provide catalogs for use by a distributors. These catalogs have a pricing system using the letters A, B, C, etc. Each letter stands for the distributor's margin at that price. So if the distributor sells at at say $4, B pricing, he will receive 60% margin.

Margi-ga's comments below are quite accurate and should be helpful. Let me see if I can clarify your other questions.

"Regarding these suppliers, what sources are there to learn about their margins?"

There are two primary and competing industry organizations to which both distributors and suppliers belong. By far the largest, and the current frontrunner is:

Advertising Speciality Institute (ASI)

<http://www.asicentral.com>

If you decide to join, they can provide supplier and wholesale pricing standards.

Propotional Products Association International (PPAI)

<http://www.ppai.org>

There is a wealth of sites on the web about the distributor end of the business, but there is no publicly available information on the Internet about supplier or wholesaler margins for obvious reasons. You would need to join an industry group for this information. But I'll impart what I know.

"How much margin do these suppliers make when selling to/through distributors?"

Margi's answer below is very good. The ultimate answer is really impossible to quantify, and will vary tremendously from product to product. The percentage manufacturer's incremental profit on a plastic standard key fob, for example, averages close to 100%. Incremental profit on a knit cap may range from 15% to 40% depending on whether it's manufactured overseas or domestically. The bottom line is that manufacturing costs are going to be all over the board. On average, however, the final price at which the manufacturer sells his product usually constitutes 25 to 50% of the final retail price.

"How much margin do these suppliers make when selling to/through distributors? How much of that margin is a mark up on the article itself?"

As mentioned, the manufacturer's costs can vary tremendously, but make up an average of 25% to 50% of the retail price. If a wholesaler is involved, which is really not that common in this industry, he will generally double the price, although this can vary widely. Most manufacturers/suppliers sell direct to distributors. These distributors mark up anywhere from a rock bottom low of 25 to 30% to a high of 60%. However longtime customers are often charged a 70% or even higher markup. Ah, the value of sales people!

"How much is a charge for applying the logo and/or message to the article? Does the margin vary much based either on the type of article or by the means used to apply the decoration (silk screen, embriodery, etc.?)"

In a typical distribution pattern, the manufacturer will sell directly to a distributor. For non-wearables, the logo is often screenprinted (or applied through other means) onto the item by the manufacturer. Since most items are not sold without logos by these manufacturers, the cost of the screenprinting is buried in the cost of the item and not broken out. It would be almost impossible to break out these costs to the manufacturer since these screenprinting shops are all inhouse. Costs would depend on labor costs, how new the machinery is, overhead rates, etc. Lets just say the actual costs are pretty negligible as a component of the finished good.

For wearables, almost exclusively, the items are drop-shipped to the distributor's chosen screenprinter or embroiderer where the logos are applied. The items are then either drop-shipped directly to the customer or to the distributor for inventorying. Every major city has several wholesale embroiderers and screenprinters who work with this industry. The actual cost of the screenprinting /embroidery varies greatly based on the type of application and the material to which it is applied.

I just called a friend of mine who has worked for both a screenprinter and a distributor, and she confirms the following. For volumes less than 250 items, the cost to the distributor of screenprinting a coffee mug may be $75 setup charge plus 20 to 30 cents each ("run charge"). The distributor will resell with a 30 to 40% markup over these figures. Screenprinting costs will generally include a setup charge in the $75 to $125 range, plus run charges of 20 cents to $1, depending on the item. A good average run charge for a t-shirt would be around $1 cost to the distributor for a multi-color job. He would mark it up 30 to 40%. Embroidery is a good bit higher and can go from a low end of 50 cents to $3. To embroider a cap with an average logo may be $95 setup charge plus $1.50 run charge each. Distributor markups are usually folded into the cost of the cap to the retail consumer, and can be much more than the standard 35%.

These are prices for a medium sized market in the Southeast USA. Other markets will vary, possibly significantly. Foreign prices are much less.

I understand that some of these answers are not as specific as you would have wished. However, I can assure you that there is no ultimate right answer for most of these questions. Prices will vary by industry, competition, geography, etc. But hopefully, this will give you some good guidelines to go by.

Brndbuilder, thanks for the question! It's been a pleasure answering a subject I know well.

Subject: Re: Promotional product supplier margins
From: margi-ga on 06 Jan 2003 21:07 PST

This was told to me by a retail consultant over a year ago. I do not know this information first hand and I'm not a Google Researcher. These answers are based on my notes.

Given: Not all imprinters actually imprint all types of products. Their facilities are set up for their specialty.

Given: Very high volume work may be done overseas (China, Phillipines, Japan) whereas mid and low-volume work may be done in the U.S. There are different costs associated with each.

Given: Different types of base products and imprint processes have different manufacturing costs.

There are four tiers, not two, to this business model:

- Manufacturer (the ones that manufacture the base item, mugs, keychains, pens)

- Imprinter (the ones that create the imprint) Sometimes, the manufacturer and the imprinter are the same company, but usually not. While some do a huge variety of items, no one imprinter does all processes on all items. Some specialize in screen printing, some in laser engraving, etc.
- Wholesaler/Aggregator (The ones that order from multiple printers on behalf of multiple distributors. Many times these are catalog companies or online merchants, and they may sell directly)
- Distributor (The ones that sell the product to the end-consumer. Sometimes they do their own catalog with selected items from different wholesalers, or they sell via a DSO model and/or their own websites, etc.)

In general, the financial model is such that...

The manufacturing cost plus imprinting generally constitutes 20-25% of the retail cost. This is because:

The imprinter generally marks up the items by 100% for his margin
The wholesaler marks the product up (again) by 100% so that the price to the distributor is $2 \times (\text{manufacturing cost} + \text{margin})$
The distributor sells the product for another 25% or so.

So, if the (base product plus imprinting) cost of the item is $2, the imprinter will charge the wholesaler $4. The wholesaler will charge the distributor $8, and the distributor will sell it to the customer for about $10 or so. This model would apply to things like mugs, pens, coasters, keyfobs, etc.

The more expensive the base product means that sometimes printers and wholesalers will accept a smaller per piece margin because following this model would make the price too expensive for the end-consumer. This is the case for things like laser engraved lucite, items engraved on gold or silver, very high-end items that simply need to be imprinted.

Sometimes, if a company or organization wants to skip the middle-men, they will buy a product directly from a manufacturer... i.e. nylon backpacks, golf bags, clocks, electronics... at wholesale, bulk pricing, -- and pay the imprint company directly to imprint their logo on it. Obviously, it would not make fiscal sense to pay the high margins all the way along with an item that may already be $10, $20, $30 a piece when the only value the imprinter is adding is the imprinting of a logo. The imprinter will set his price based on the shape and material (ceramic, brass, cloth) of the item, the image area of the imprint, the imprint process to be used, the volume, the artwork that will be supplied, the turn-around time, etc. Again, they will probably take their cost (remember, they did not have to purchase or arrange for the substrate/item to be imprinted) and mark it up 100% with a minimum that usually covers a set up fee and a minimum volume.

Pricing is a tricky thing. You have to balance costs and margins every step along the way, while still making it cost-effective for each tier to participate, and still deliver a quality product to the customer at a price they are willing to pay...

Although this is not a complete answer, I hope this helps. Again, I don't know this first hand except that I ended up being one of those organizations that purchased the item wholesale and contracted with an imprinter directly, so take it for what it's worth.

Abstract:

A product package includes a vertical container in which a base product is located and a lid assembly. The container has a top opening and a side periphery while the lid assembly include a lid which closes the top opening of the container. The lid includes (a) a peripheral skirt which engages the side periphery to hold the lid in place, (b) a top extending centrally of the peripheral skirt and having a top band extending centrally from adjacent the upper end of the peripheral skirt and a depression which extends downwards from the top band to a position substantially equal to or above the lower edge of the skirt, and (c) a peripheral retention lip which extends upwards and inwards from the top band. The lid assembly also includes an insert having a peripheral border. The insert is sized such that the peripheral border is retained underneath of the peripheral retention lip so that the insert is held on the lid. The lid assembly also includes a secondary product which is located in the depression and which is held therein by the insert. Preferably, the product package also includes a tamper evident shrink band.
